The papers tell us we live in a broken society: crime, divorce, and unemployment are up. People, they say, lack the moral values of past generations. I don't think this is true.

Take family relations. We are constantly exhorted to prioritize our work and careers as a route to personal satisfaction. Most people, however, realize that true happiness lies in the family, so even really busy people make sure they spend quality time with their parents, spouses, and children.

It is also remarkable how well behaved and considerate most people are in public places. For example, even in massive cities like Tokyo, where there is a lot of stress and people are crowded onto rush-hour trains every day, fights and arguments remain very rare.

While the Internet allows access to subversive information, such as where to buy illegal drugs, or even how to make a bomb, has the world as we know it fallen apart? No. There are some who may be swayed by such information, but the majority of people know where to draw the line between acceptable and unacceptable behavior.

The fact that people have kept their moral values rather than lost them is surely worthy of media attention, but that would not make the sensational story newspapers crave.
